

Hawaii

Tribune Herald

Thursday, January 12, 2012

Proudly serving Hilo and the Big Island since 1923

50 cents

SPORTS

Daggers slip by Vikings in thriller

Page D1

BUSINESS

Store endures as world changes

Page B1

Nuclear scientist is killed in Iran

Page A5

WORLD

County elections workers fired

Four terminated following investigation into misuse of warehouse

By JASON ARMSTRONG
Tribune-Herald staff writer

Hawaii County has fired four elections workers, including the program administrator, following an investigation into alcohol storage and private business activities allegedly conducted at a Hilo elections warehouse.

"They have received termination notices already," County Council Chairman Domingo Yagong said of three letters dated Friday.

A separate notice had been sent earlier to another employee whose termination appeal is now at the arbitration level, he said. The infractions dealt with violations of county policy, the Hamakua councilman said Wednesday.

"I don't want to go into details," and jeopardize the process, Yagong said when asked for specific reasons for the discharges. The warehouse remains closed as the Police Department is conducting its investigation, Yagong said Wednesday. However, it's still being used as a storage facility for election ballots, he said.

YAGONG

Yagong confirmed four employees have "separated" from the county, but she couldn't divulge why. However, she identified the employees as Pat Nakamoto, a

The final decision (to be-

See WORKERS Page A6

ATU

A6 Thursday, January 12, 2012

BACK PAGE

WORKERS From front page

longtime elections program administrator, Glen Shikuma, warehouse manager Shyla Ayau, and Elton Nakagawa.

None is listed in the phone book. Other efforts to reach each for comment were unsuccessful Wednesday.

The investigation started with Shikuma, who is accused of running a sign-printing business out of the elections warehouse and also storing alcohol there.

In July, Shikuma denied any wrongdoing and said he had "no idea" what the investigation was about. An elections employee since 1999, he was later transferred to the main elections office in the Hawaii County Building.

County employees are barred from using government time, equipment or facilities for private business, according to county law. Also, the county has had a no-alcohol policy since 2005.

One source said he's seen Shikuma storing empty alcohol bottles in the warehouse and also attending a year-end party, complete with alcohol, held in the parking lot.

HOLLYN JOHNSON/Tribune-Herald

A Hilo elections warehouse is seen recently at 201 Makaala St.

One day after the Nov. 2, 2010, general election, Shikuma was arrested and charged with drunken driving. He was later convicted and sentenced for the DUI violation.

According to the county's budget, 22 people, including 10 temporary employees, work for the county's Elections Division, which is responsible for all elections activities in the county. The four terminated employees collectively represent one-third of the permanent staff.

The council has already paid Corporate Specialized Intelligence & Investigations ELC $1,000 and agreed to pay up to another $1,000 for its investigation into the matter, Kawauchi said in November.

On Wednesday, she said the cost hasn't risen, but couldn't immediately identify the total taxpayer expense.

Email Jason Armstrong at jarmstrong@hawaiitribune-herald.com.

WHAT TH 12 JAN 2012 9A

County fires four workers over election scandal

BY JASON ARMSTRONG,
STEPHENS MEDIA

HILO — Hawaii County has fired four elections workers, including the program administrator, following an investigation into alcohol storage and private business activities allegedly conducted at a Hilo elections warehouse.

They have received termination notices already, County Council Chairman Dominic Yagong said of three letters dated Friday.

A separate notice had been sent earlier to another employee whose termination appeal is now at the arbitration level, he said.

The infractions dealt with violations of county policy, the Hamakua councilman said Wednesday.

"I don't want to go into details and jeopardize the process," Yagong said when asked for specific reasons for the discharges.

Last July 7, Yagong and County Clerk Jamae Kawauchi visited the roughly 2,000-square-foot warehouse the county rents at 210 Makaala Street. Concerned with what he saw, Yagong ordered the locks changed that night and that an independent investigation be conducted.

The warehouse remains closed as the Police Department is continuing its investigation, Yagong said Wednesday.

However, it's still being used as a storage facility for election ballot boxes, he said.

"The final decision (to terminate the employees) is made by the county clerk but I was involved in the decision-making process," Yagong said.

Kawauchi confirmed four employees have "separated" from the county but couldn't divulge why.

However, she identified the employees as Pat Nakamoto, elections program administrator, Glen Shikuma, warehouse manager Shyla Ayari and Elton Nakagawa.

None is listed in the phone book. Other efforts to reach each for comment were unsuccessful Wednesday.

The investigation started with Shikuma, who is accused of running a sign-printing business out of the elections warehouse and also storing alcohol there.

In July, Shikuma denied any wrongdoing and said he had "no idea" what the investigation was about. An elections employee since 1999, he was later transferred to the main elections office in the Hawaii County Building.